SUMMER LANDSCAPE

If you have no snow this week, you can use sound scientific facts to improve your appearance.

Horticulturists at Virginia Polytechnic Institute say Kentucky bluegrass and fescues growing in too full sun may be seriously damaged by close mowing, or by any mowing in dry weather.

The recommended heights for mowing turfgrasses are: bluegrass, 1½ to 2 inches; tall fescue, 2 to 2½ inches; creeping red fescue, 2 inch; and zoysia, ¾ to 1 inch.

Crabgrass may soon become a problem in many lawns. It grows when days are hot and long. If you have established a good sod and manage it properly, the crabgrass will have little chance to grow. It will grow in thin and bare spots, but not in shade. A thick dense turf that is not cut too short will shade and therefore retard the growth of crabgrass. One way to keep crabgrass down is to prevent the plants from setting viable seed that will produce an infestation next season. Rake the lawn to bring immature seed heads of crabgrass within the reach of the mower, and then mow. Catching the seed heads with a grass catcher on the mower will also help.

Chemical crabgrass killers are on the market. See VPI Extension Circular 820, "Lawn Weed Control," available from county agents, or from the VPI Agricultural Extension Service, Blacksburg.

The horticulturists have other summer landscaping tips:

During the summer, many materials can be added to the compost pile. The grass clippings, weeds, garden plants, scraps of vegetables, or clippings from pruning. The materials in the compost pile are of little value to the gardner until after they have rotted, so take pains to hasten the decomposition. The rotting is brought about by the work of certain organisms which must have nitrogen, moisture, and air. To supply nitrogen and at the same time increase the food value of the compost, spread about 1 pint of garden fertilizer (5-10-5) over each 6-inch layer where the compost is 10 feet long and 5 feet wide. Scatter a handful of lime over each layer unless you plan to use the compost for acid soil plants such as azaleas.

Don't wait until a sudden wind storm knocks over your perennials Set out garden stakes and tie tall-growing perennials. Many dahlias and gladioli need to be staked. Painted stakes will be better.

Dig Daffodils

Daffodil bulbs may be dug now, it is necessary to move them or if they need to be divided. If the tops are yellow but not dead,leave them on the bulb.Bushel baskets are good storage containers for the summer. Lay the basket on its side. Place the bulbs toward the bottom of the basket. Separate different varieties by using sheets of newspapers between them. Store in a dry, shaded, ventilated place until they are dry enough to clean.They can be planted in September and early October. Tulip bulbs keep best in the ground, but they can be handled in the same way as daffodils.

Water Needed

Summer is often a critical time for certain trees and shrubs because of a lack of soil moisture. Spring-planted trees or shrubs are especially vulnerable. Mulching with sawdust, peat, pine tags, peanut hulls, or other similar materials will help save soil moisture. From time to time, you may need to loosen the mulching material, as some mulches tend to cake and form a hard crust making it hard for water to penetrate.

Do not sprinkle, but water thoroughly. Frequent light waterings do more harm than good. A good way to water trees and shrubs is to let the hose run slowly around each plant until the ground is thoroughly soaked. If you use a garden sprinkler, check occasionally by making a few diggings with a trowel to see how far the water has penetrated into the soil.
